2 Reading & Comprehension

Read the Following passage, then answer the questions:

It is important to bear in mind that our ability to communicate effectively over long distances with other people on our planet is a relatively new development. The increase in ease of global communication has been phenomenal, something we are all too unappreciative of. We take it for granted that we can as easily place a call to Beijing or Kyoto or Pusan from another continent as we can call up our relatives in the next town. The telephone can be used to call for help, to arrange a meeting, to hire an employee, to transfer money and to do a thousand and one other things. Now we can do the same with handheld mobile phones or other pieces of electronic equipment like the fax or the computer.

It was not always the case. Take, for example, the United States of America. Domestic telephone services have been in place for over a century but calls overseas were, until recently, fraught with difficulties. After the war, calls to Asia and Europe used to rely on short-wave radio signals that bounced off the ionosphere, the electrically active layer of the atmosphere that lies between 50 and 250 miles above the earth's surface. Setting up a call involved hours of preparation and, when the call was made, sound quality was often affected by static.

Subsequent developments have been rapid as moves were made through copper wire cable, through satellite technology to present-day fibre optic cables. With computer communications, it is now possible to send text and images, which are, in many ways, superior to reliance on the human voice. In addition, if you need help but are not sure where that help might be found, you can search the World Wide Web for information or, if unsuccessful, send out a message to a chat group or bulletin board soliciting help. This could involve mundane things or matters of far greater importance. Medical doctors are now wont to post details of complex medical conditions online in the hope that fellow practitioners might be able to offer insights or point them in the direction of help. Truly global communications have become a significant force for good in the modern world.

Read the Following passage, then answer the questions:

We tend to think of the passport as ordinary and natural, a common fact of existence. But in reality, the passport is a relatively modern invention and its development has been spurred by war and social conflict.
In the new global war on terror, the technology of the passport will once again be upgraded. In the not so distant future, travellers heading out of Australia will have a passport, equipped, not just with the usual small colour photograph, but with some form of biometric identification. It may be a scan of the passport holders' right iris for example, since each iris is unique and unmistakable, and can be rendered in digital form as a complex set of numbers and stored in a database. So no one need ever be mistaken for anyone else again. Passport fraud will be all but eliminated - and in the words of political scientist and historian of the passport, John Torpey, we may all become prisoners of our own identities.

In this age of jumbo jets and mass tourism, it has become easier and easier to move about the world. But as the physical restrictions on travel are reduced, so the bureaucratic barriers and filters on human movement are refined. The success of any given journey will depend on what kind of passport, if any, you hold.
